For some blogging is already as prevalent as emailing. Millions record daily information about lives that ranges from the very boring to the peculiar and exciting. Ultimately one supposes it will create whole virtual communities of people bonded by similar strings of interest. Like dying your hair blue and wearing red shoes? There's probably a specialist blogging community for you to join right now. Blogs are also replacing chatrooms for being a source of useful information. In the course of compiling this newsletter, I've got interesting tit bits from a variety of blogs – all credited back of course - and the Guardian recently reported that even corporates and politicians are getting into blogging. So before the whole thing passes you by and you end up in techno dinosaur land with Wang, telex and the pager. You might want to get on the futurologist blogging bandwagon? Editor comment. The what? The who?

To help you techno suburbanites get to grips with it all there is a very exciting event about to happen in Chicag-ey. November 11th and 12th. It's a two day education program which brings the largest group of legal bloggers ever assembled together. Matthew Homann, LexThinks President and Chief Thinking officer says 'instead of being lectured at or watching PowerPoint slides, BlawgThink attendee's will actively participate in the learning process. We recognise that our attendees will add as much to the conference as they take away.'

Legal onliners now dominate just over 5% of the blogging community earning their own nickname of 'blawgers'. A survey conducted by Blogads.com revealed. They were fourth behind computer professionals. BlawgThink is being co-produced by JoAnna Forshee of Envision Agency.
